

Indiana's law concerning privacy from telephone solicitors has been a godsend for me. I was receiving numerous calls prior to applying for protection. These have stopped, affording me some peace in my home. All the calls I had been receiving were offering me things that I did not want. There were some periods of time when these calls were made when my family was undergoing periods of stress due to illness, and we were expecting calls of an emergency nature. None of these calls involved anything I was not aware of via other methods of advertisements. They were a nuisance. Businesses have a right to ply their trade, but not to the point telephone solicitations allowed. I would be unhappy with any federal government regulations that interfered with Indiana's right to respond to legitimate desires of Indiana residents.
